
In this article, the principal investigator of the Chromosome 18 Clinical Research Center introduces the journal’s readership to some of the most important aspects of genetic advocacy groups. For example, she discusses the various functions of advocacy groups as well as factors that influence the development of advocacy groups. The article encourages the development of partnerships between physicians and genetic advocacy groups to improve medical care and the lives of those affected by genetic conditions.